Purpose is to study psychological characteristics of ethno-cultural identity of the titular ethnos of Kazakhstan.

Methods: Technique to identify auto and hetero stereotypes; Test of relations; N = 343. Central component of internalized ethno-cultural identity is very strong positive feeling of human as representative of © 2016 International Union of Psychological Science Race and Ethnicity 989 certain ethno cultural group. In modern Kazakhstan society there are people, who characterized by transformation of ethnic identity. Conflicts of ethnic identity were experimentally identified. Identification with Kazakh ethnic group increases the number of positive auto stereotypes. Predominance of identification with Russian ethnic group leads to critical and sometimes negative assessment of Kazakh ethnic group. Perhaps, this is due to stereotype assessments rather than knowledge of representatives of particular ethnic group. Existence of ethnic identity's conflicts in forms of dual identity, identification with another ethnic group and insignificant ethnic identification may indicate that ethno-cultural identity of the titular ethnos of Kazakhstan is not fully formed.
