The climate crisis was in focus as activists and critics collided at the World Economic Forum in the snowy Alpine ski resort of Davos, Switzerland.

Overheated markets, space and trade deals were also on the agenda as the world's political and business leaders convened at this year's summit.

U.S. President Donald Trump likened Elon Musk to inventor Thomas Edison, calling the CEO of Tesla and SpaceX one of the world's "great geniuses."

He told CNBC's Joe Kernen in an interview that "we have to protect our genius."

"You know, we have to protect Thomas Edison and we have to protect all of these people that came up with originally the light bulb and the wheel and all of these things. And he's one of our very smart people and we want to cherish those people," the president said.

Trump's comments came after a recent surge in Tesla's shares, which have more than doubled since September.

Liberal billionaire George Soros took aim at Trump, warning that the U.S. economy could be headed for calamity as a result of the president's efforts to juice American business and stock prices ahead of the 2020 election.
