PHENOMENON OF «STRATEGIC ASIA» IN THE WORLD POLITICS

Introduction

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, there are arising of new political, economic, social and another trends composing the nature of the international system and defining its features. China, as a geopolitical entity during Deng Xiaoping’s reforms had accepted by the midst of 90s new power projection capabilities based on its economic mighty. Another new geopolitical patterns which tape post cold war international order was a power shifting from Europe to Asian continent: the Middle East and Asia-Pacific. China affects both foreign policy dimensions: its periphery as a geopolitics and international affairs on various set of issues. Development of new geopolitical and security patterns triggered strategic thinkers to found and accept a new term which would be capable to explain occurring contemporary processes related to China’s rise and themes adjusting to it.

Term «Strategic Asia» and its sense

Concept of «Strategic Asia» originates from the US NBR (National Bureau of Research). In general, this conceptual political term has two features describing its nature. First, academic and second is a common political. Inherently the term «Strategic Asia» it is a mark of the program initiated by the National Bureau of Asian Research in the beginning of 2000s. As it mentioned by founder authors of this program – Ashley J. Tellis and Aaron L. Friedberg, the program of the “Strategic Asia” is dedicated to studies of the contemporary global power shift from West or Atlantic to Asia-Pacific in the post cold war system, with the strategic implications for further US policy [1]. Program itself is composed of three basic aims: first, provide sufficient knowledge on occurring trends within the region; second, forecasting of process and development of the events; third, recording of main events which shape contemporary picture of the region [2].

Giving a centrality to China’s rise and its strategic impact on Asian landmass (editor’s note – under Asia in terms of political geography is perceived area of Western Pacific, Asian Far East and South-East Asia littoral areas), NBR in the light of its research activ-

The second major sense of the "Strategic Asia" concept is political. In some extent we can find out some similarities with William Churchill's famous quote on "iron curtain" and "cold war". Here, the basic similarities led not within the perception of war like a permanent situation and etc. William Churchill's quote on "cold war" is the most suitable general strategic explanation for that time geopolitical situation: both belligerent Superpowers did not attack each other, but were in high readiness to do it in any time, especially in crisis periods where nuclear missiles technologies were vast developed and deployed. In general political sense, the term of "Strategic Asia" describes a geographical dimension of the contemporary strategic situation around China's geographical periphery.

In academic terms, phenomenon of "Strategic Asia" could be explained through two IR theoretical concepts: constructivist concept of securitization and geopolitical "The Clash of Civilizations". These both political concepts have suitable approaches in discovering and explanation of the generation and development of "Strategic Asia".

Equally important sense in the formation of Asia-Pacific security architecture in theoretical terms is belong to the concept of securitization. The concept of securitization belongs to Copenhagen School founder of which are Barry Buzan and Ole Waever. The sense of securitization within Asia-Pacific is based on constructivist perceptions of threats and challenges which make a vision and goal of foreign and security policy of the states. Another main component of the concept is that major actors in the IR system are states. Foreign policy processes occurring to these states are divided into two main directions: unresolvably and action, which can drive stability or instability. In the Asia-Pacific region, it is a major player, the USA that is often subject to disputes and challenges. The USA has taken a proactive approach in such challenges. The USA seeks to maintain its direct and indirect influence in the region, as well as to counter the influence of such countries as China, Japan, and so on.

An article by Sanjay Brar and Uday Singh "Clash of Civilizations?" discusses the geopolitical implications of such a shift from taking the "Clash of Civilizations" model to the "Clash of Geopolitical Orders". The article raises concerns about the implications of such a shift in geopolitical thinking. The article notes that the "Clash of Civilizations" model has been criticized for its lack of attention to economic factors and its tendency to oversimplify geopolitical interactions.

The article concludes by calling for a more nuanced geopolitical perspective that takes into account both cultural and economic factors. The article notes that the "Clash of Geopolitical Orders" model offers a more comprehensive perspective on geopolitical interactions, but also acknowledges that it is not without its own limitations.

In the end, the phenomenon of "Strategic Asia" is complex and multi-faceted, and requires a nuanced understanding of both geopolitical and cultural factors. The article suggests that a more comprehensive geopolitical perspective is needed to fully understand the phenomenon of "Strategic Asia".
occurring within the Asia-Pacific fully correspond to these standards.

China’s rise generated by economic growth, unresolved regional issues on maritime disputes and accelerated military modernization, all of it drive shaping of security patterns within the Asia-Pacific. In terms of geopolitics, China’s rise make it a major focus of its neighbors and other regional players. Perceptions of China’s policy on maritime disputes and ongoing military modernization have taken a high attention of China’s neighbors, from such countries like Japan and Taiwan which have direct relation to security issues in the region, as well as Russia and Kazakhstan which do not have such contested issues, but in attention on China’s deep aspirations.

Another famous political concept was proposed by Samuel P. Huntington in his famous work «The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order». By the author was noted idea, that both geopolitical entities in the post cold war system would pose challenge to West – political Islam and China. In terms of geopolitics, it was a power shift from Europe to Asia, to say precisely, to the Middle East and Asia. Demography and economy, two generating factors within political processes, respectively. Here, the Asia-Pacific becomes one of the generators of global political processes and trends [3].

Term of the «Strategic Asia» in its explanation and reviling of occurring processes around China’s ascendency, has in general geographical dimension. Two factors which make this: China’s central geographic position in Asian landmass [4] and China’s accumulated power in its economic might which in turn enables Beijing’s active foreign economic policy expansion around the world. In order to understand a full picture of Chinese strategic situation, it is need to differentiate between China’s peripheral diplomacy which is foundation of the «Strategic Asia» and overall Chinese foreign policy. The basic distinction which led among them that China’s peripheral diplomacy in general terms is defined by security patterns, meanwhile foreign policy in non-peripheral areas around the globe are used basically on economic cooperation.

«Strategic Asia» in geographical dimension is divided into two strategic areas: Eurasian littoral or Western Pacific, more broadly Indo-Pacific area, where main actors presented by China, South Korea, Japan and Taiwan, ASEAN, India and the USA. Security patterns are generated by two primary trends: first, territorial disputes over islands chain in the Japanese Sea and in the South China Sea, calibration by parties Exclusive Economic Zones and Continental Shelves.

Second, by PLA military modernization and non-transparent spending according to China’s ASEAN neighbors and the US. Another geographic dimension of «Strategic Asia» generated security patterns within Eurasian hinterland neighboring with China: Mongolia, Russian Far East, Eastern Siberia and Central Asian republics neighboring with China. In this geographic area, security patterns related with China are defined by the transnational trends and perceptions of China in some extent is obscure. Here, if China’s policy in the Asia-Pacific sub regions is defined by confrontational actions such as introduction of aerial identification zones, maritime disputes and probable military confrontation spurred by the region disputed areas and security dilemma, in Central Asia and Russia it has a different manner.

Chinese policy is characterized by economic cooperation in terms of investments flow, search over energy supplies in order to secure volumes of energy supplies from unstable Persian Gulf. Main factor which makes these countries at first sight politically distant from China, but the part of the «Strategic Asia» it is a widespread suspicious expectations of the local populations on «Chinese expansion» or in other words «quiet expansion» which means that Chinese domination over the region will be achieved by non military means, but throughout low political patters: economic cooperation where China has disparate positions and migration of Chinese labor force. Some percentage of locals within Asian part of the post-Soviet space neighboring with China, are suspicious about true Chinese foreign policy aspirations toward the region.

It would be as well as important to note, in terms of global geopolitical rivalry, that copying of the previous US – Soviet contest would be wrong on the contemporary Sino – US interaction. In spite of the United States, China’s security patterns are presented only in its periphery and not presented globally like the US. China’s influence in Africa, Middle East and Latin America are restricted by economic-trade relations and energy cooperation. If Beijing has a real aspiration to became a global power, it should respectively correspond to all elements of the «structural power» [5]. China’s power is spread disproportionately: China is the second world economy in the world, but it is component in security issues are restricted by adjusting geographical regions.

Nowadays, in the post cold war international system, «Strategic Asia» it is a place where are generated various regional security processes with global impact. China’s geopolitical ascendency and its geopolitical spillover to Asian landmass in different directions, makes an Asia-Pacific an engine of contemporary security and geopolitical trends.

Asia-Pacific security patterns

Asia-Pacific security patterns in the context of ‘Strategic Asia’ has a broad sense in the multidimensional complex of regional security issues. Security patterns are distinguished in the following patterns, which make up the regional security architecture:

- maritime-territorial disputes;
- military buildup;
- institutional building.

First major security pattern is the role of the maritime-territorial disputes within regional security parameters. Disputes over the western edge of PRC borders were settled peacefully and in normal dynamic of diplomatic relations with disputed contenders, meanwhile eastern edge, precisely within Eastern China and South China Sea in which much of issues are still not settled. There are two main points in Western Pacific: Senkaku/Diaoyu islands (China-Japan), Soocota rock (Japan-Korea) and issue Taiwan’s independence. Another area of dispute: South-China Sea, where the main issue is the clarification of Exclusive Economic Zones and Continental Shelves.

In dispute over the South China Sea are involved major regional countries like: Vietnam, Malaysia, Philippines, PRC, Taiwan, Brunei. Maritime-territorial disputes, in its turn define what kind of the military balance or in other broader terms – security dilemma would be in the region. Second security pattern it is a military buildup. Many experts believe that regional military buildup is a proceeding from PLA military modernization that has taken incremental pates since the end of bipolar world. China’s growing military budget for its army new capabilities modernization, has a strong political effect on its neighbors, from small in military capacity like the Philippines and Kazakhstan to states like Russia or Japan which military spending are significant in the global level.

Meanwhile Chinese high financial budget allocations trigger regional suspicions on Beijing’s true aspirations. Another, significant geopolitical factor, it is a China’s central geographic position which makes it a important player in the shaping of Asian security patterns [6].

Especially, military-strategic situation raised since the collapse of the Soviet Union regarding PRC military strategy direction and potential, places PLA modernization of forces in general to the South East Asia particularly and Western Pacific as a whole [7]. In the contemporary period, within PLA modernization process major attention is paid for the development of Air Forces, Navy and Second Artillery and Missile Forces which must play a decisive role in the «local wars under condition of informationization» [8]. And the third main security pattern, it is the institutional building within Asia-Pacific.

In the region, in spite of China’s high capabilities, however, primacy of the institutional building belongs to the United States. Announced by Obama administration in 2012, issued in DoD report: «Sustaining US Global Leadership: Priorities for 21st Century Defense». «Rebalancing» strategy toward Asia-Pacific has a complex character. It is composed of three main branches: security-military, diplomatic which almost is identical or the part of the security-military and economic. Security-military sphere is composed of the network of US bases across Indo-Pacific region in accordance with newly announced US military forces dedicated to sustaining of the «rebalancing». Fact which confirms this position it’s former US Defense Secretary alleged that 60% of US Navy stays in the Indo-Pacific region [9]. Another economic filed, is presented within the region by Trans Pacific Partnership. Economic institutional building here, plays a geopolitical role and basically dedicated to the engagement strategy where Beijing would have to consider to join and accept offered rules with outgoing implications.

Conclusion

The major geopolitical processes nowadays occur in Asia Pacific with the concentration in China. Two Great power which shape regional and global construction is presented by the United States and China and other countries who are in ally relations with these great powers. Major geopolitical trends and security patterns developing within Asia-Pacific region are generated by two Super powers in the shaping of this region's political, economic and military construction. China as a initiator of the securitization of regional issues and the United States as a main offer to build a set of regional links with China's engagement or containment. Security issue embodied in the face of geopolitical construction, would be look as a concentration of power center in China as a indigenous and leading Asian power or US Pacific power with the concentration in Pacific.
